8-2 Project Two: Feedback and Revision Reflection

Throughout this course, revising for coherence and structure significantly enhanced my writing, making my arguments more logical and easier to follow. The strategy of reading my work aloud was particularly effective, as it helped me catch inconsistencies and awkward phrasing I might have missed otherwise. This technique improved the flow of my essays and deepened my engagement with my writing, a practice I intend to carry forward into my next course. Feedback was crucial in this process, encouraging me to be more critical of my work and open to change. Constructive criticism from my instructor and peers highlighted areas I had not considered for improvement, such as stronger thesis statements and more varied sentence structures. This feedback has fundamentally altered how I approach writing, instilling in me a more iterative and reflective writing process that I believe will enhance the quality of my future work.

In crafting my essays, I consciously adjusted my tone and language to match the academic audience of this course, incorporating formal vocabulary and structured arguments to convey my points effectively. This approach ensured that my writing was taken seriously and demonstrated my understanding of the subject matter. Looking ahead, I anticipate writing for diverse audiences, from academic peers and instructors to professionals in my future career field. To connect with these varied audiences, I plan to ask several key questions before starting any writing project: What is their level of expertise on the topic? What are their main interests or concerns related to this subject? What do they hope to learn or achieve by reading my work? By considering these questions, I aim to create content that is relevant and engaging for my audience and meets their specific needs and expectations.
